2003 Paper 2 Question 7

Software Engineering I

Software engineering academics said for years that a significant percentage of large software projects failed. In the run-up to Y2K, most of the world's large companies claimed that fixing the Millennium Bug was a large project whose success was critical to their survival. One would therefore expect many large companies to have failed, but none did. Who was mistaken? Justify your answer. [20 marks]